Ernest S. Miner states that another man visits his wife during his absence on business, a bill for divorce from Ernest Miner, filed in superior court Saturday.

Mr. Miner charges that his wife is friendly with this man who he states came to his home upon previous occasions. He refuses to give the man's name but says his wife's infatuation for him has been growing. He alleges she has told him she did not care for him and wished he would get out.

He states she has sent their six year old child to his parents in Vassar, Mich., saying that she did not want to take care of him and that she did not care if he never saw him again.

He asks for custody of the child, asserting that she is an unfit person to have the custody.

Revelations of a Wife

Their Second Honeymoon

BY ADELE GARRISON.

HOW MADGE FOLLOWED ALLEN DRAKE'S INDIRECT DIRECTIONS.

The Jamaica express rushed along the flat Long Island landscape illuminated by a wonderful moonlight. Into which the spring twilight had merged. But although my face was turned toward the window, and ostensibly was watching the flying panorama of woodland, meadow and streams, in reality I saw almost nothing of the silver-tinted beauty flitting past my window.

My brain had room for one thought, one question, and it pounded itself against my consciousness again and again until even the clicking wheels beneath me seemed to sound its syllables.

Had I read aright the directions hidden in Allen Drake's casual sentences?

I went over them again, recalled the easy, careless grace of the man as he stood by the side of Grace Drake, realized his skill in handling the almost impossible situation in which we had found ourselves.

Alone With Imagination.

He must have meant me to wait in the tiny box-like waiting room on the Jamaica platform, the only shelter the railroad provided for the thousands of commuters using its trains. It was the only inference I could draw from his question—practically an assertion—concerning my going home, and his sympathizing remarks about the platform.

And he had escorted me to my train, and knew exactly what time it would reach its destination. Search my recollection of his words as I might, I could find no other meaning hidden in them.

At any rate, there was no course open to me but to follow my own convictions in the matter. That he had meant me to understand something from his seemingly casual words I was certain, because of Lillian's warning. I could only interpret them as best I could.

But so great was my dread that I had misunderstood him, and consequently had failed Lillian, that I was shaking as if with cold when the train drew into Jamaica and I stepped out on the platform. The guards were calling the names of the different east-bound trains in stentorian tones, and the platform was filled with hurrying commuters rushing for seats.

I was puzzled at first to account for so many people at the late hour, but I remembered that there had been a national guard parade in the city, and realized the reason for the late-comers.

It took all the police I could muster to turn into the lighted little waiting room and take a seat. To my heated imagination it seemed that every commuter on the platform must be speculating upon the reason for my sitting down there instead of taking the Babylon local, which stood waiting for its passengers just outside the window.

But that ordeal was nothing to the one which awaited me when the trains had all pulled out and I was left the solitary occupant of the waiting room. I was seized with an unaccountable terror of the loneliness, for even the guards seemed to have departed from the platform. The fruit stand and newspaper stand were closed. As far as I could see there was no one beside me on the whole length of the platform.

An Inquisitive Guard.

The windows running the length of both sides of the room seemed like so many staring eyes watching me. I huddled into the corner next the telephone booth, where, at least, there was no window at my back, and with the forlorn hope that the movement would steady my shaking nerves I took out my knitting bag.

As I did so my fingers touched the cold metal of the small ammonia gun which Katherine had put in her knitting bag for any emergency which I might be called upon to face. Curiously enough no feeling of security came to me with the touch of the metal. Instead it was a source of added terror, as I began to speculate upon the possibility, remote though it appeared, that I might have to use the little weapon.

A masculine step sounded outside the door, and in the moment that elapsed before a guard put his head in at the door I suffered torturing suspense.

"Missed your train?" he asked.

"Yes," I answered laconically.

"Which one do you want?" Did I imagine it or was there suspicion in his tones?

I remembered reading that the railroads were taking extra precautions against possible spies in these first days of our country's entrance into the war.

"A Long Wait."

"The one that goes to Marvin."

Try as I might I couldn't keep a slight tremor out of my voice.

He shot a keen glance at me.

"There was no mix-up on that train," he said with the air of a man stating an incontrovertible fact.

"Both the Brooklyn and New York express pulled up on schedule, and there was plenty of time for everybody to get seats."

His manner made me search my wits for an explanation.

"I thought I would have time to send a telephone message," I stammered.

His face cleared. Fortunately I had given a plausible explanation of my delay.

"No chance to telephone between those trains tonight," he said almost jovially. "Too bad! You'll have a long wait until the next train."

BREAD CONTEST DREW BIG ENTRY

Nearly 1,000 Women Tried For Portion of Prize Offered by Busse Bakery.

Spurred on by the opportunity to draw a generous slice of $500 prize money, nearly a thousand women of South Bend and vicinity entered the bread contest held under the direction of the Busse bakery. The bread was taken to the tea room of Robertson Bros. store where it was carefully judged and scored by members of the Household Arts department of the public school.

In order that there be no chance for favoritism, the bread was entered by number only. Each loaf was carefully weighed, tested, and judged according to the standards set down by the domestic science department some years ago. In this way the points chiefly considered were quality of the crumb, quality and color of the crust, proportion, lightness, wholesomeness and finally the general appearance.

Owing to the generosity of the prizes, the contest drew the largest number of entries of any similar event ever staged in South Bend. The winner of the first prize will receive $100. The women having the second and third best loaves receive $50 each. The next four winners get $25 each, the next 10 $10 each, while the 20 next best get $5 each.

The recipe for the first prize bread will be used by the big new Busse bakery in turning out their Mothers' Prize loaf, which is a new addition to their already popular brands of bread. It is expected that the new loaf will be on sale at all the grocery stores next Thursday. The bread, with ribbons and numbers announcing the winners, is being displayed today in the window of Robertson Bros. store.
